

The Dalliance of the Flies at a Waffle House in Virginia (after a theme by Whitman, in the style of Ginsberg)

Above the honeycombed batter, the flies in end of July heat—between sips of water and coffee, I am humbled in Virginia by old glory of amative burst tumble, the bliss that distracts also from side order hash brown patty.

Two black stars in coital galaxy, thermal pressure before ebullient swell of collapsing mass. The flies in rapt ignorance of gravity plunge toward another earth below.

Where I sit, diner booth shade forgiving the unsanitary spectacle, union of germs, unshaven limbs.

Do the waitresses ever pause to witness the luscious iridescence comingling, the stellar birth that brings the pangs of failed equilibrium, of stellar death . . . ?

As I dwell and wait for the check, one lover drifts from the other lands orgy warm upon the cracked tabletop, rubbing forelegs back to ugly—

Still life waffle house with dalliance of flies.

I gather my laptop bag and sunglasses, head to the airport, abandoning the Seven Cities.
Patrons behind me unaware that from their forks they chew the unknowable sex splash of each other, the white noise of nearly silent wings that carry from zenith to zenith our microcosmic dust.

Song of a third eye that witnesses the beautiful and final

She was otherwise beautiful, a demigoddess, the pierce-faced college girl, with labret smile and studded septum.
In the dim light of bar, I saw her hand wrap around a pint glass—there lone abscess on her knuckle, a displaced tilaka like an atrophied eye.

A requiem hole, injected with Siva, sanguine-crust of smattered poppy;
the hypodermic loop that bore small-town crater into her, over and over,
made the clitoris and annuit coeptis useless;
the ellipsis of darkly sore staring pustule—rudely I fixed
on this black dilation.

On the ride home, I thought long on this girl's addiction and wondered when the veins of time might also collapse on other beautiful here in Indiana.
And the moon, like a third eye, at once settled its enormous vermillion gaze on me.
The end will be like this, I thought,
when everyone forfeits, shuffles in wan assemblage:
eyes closed against the one, lidless in terrible blossom, what rushes sudden
from a bloody circle of light.

MANDATORY ENDORSEMENT [OF A] NUCLEAR CLAUSE

The Highly Enriched Iteration of a 1958 Mortgager's Policy Rider

The word "fire" [. . .] attached hereto [. . .] does not embrace nuclear reaction or nuclear radiation or radioactive contamination, [. . .] controlled—uncontrolled;

and loss by nuclear reaction
or nuclear radiation or radioactive contamination is not [. . .] insured against;

[. . .] whether such loss be direct—indirect, proximate or remote, [. . .] aggravated by any other peril.

Direct loss [. . .] from nuclear reaction
or nuclear radiation or radioactive contamination is, [. . .] however, subject to the foregoing.

Do not ask why we are hated

At the end of Ramadan, the North Shore of Boston, at the intersection behind a Ford-F150, the rear plate advertises 617-666-.... I hear the word Dabbah.

The irony of it—Washington Street, Pandemonium and the great beast of hubris idling in a phone number.
On the passenger side, a gas station, here more

Washington by the gallon, rubble pulled from our wallets to buy paper cups of coffee. Just the other morning a sinner scratched off one thousand Washingtons here, performed his Pledge of Allegiance in front of the attendant.

He waved the perforated stub like an amputated limb, a minuteman, the whites of his eyes, muzzle flashes of sclera there was his roadside bomb of Hallelujah. Christ, how he could utter he would rather have claimed 500 dollars to forego the ride to the lottery office.

If only someone were to wrap him in stars and stripes and pour unleaded Washington—87, 89, 93—brand the word SUPER all over his body, give him 666 reasons to cry.

Over coffee, Revelation

While I scry the cup of black water, old prophet calls forth an ocean of torsos, the Pacific theater he conjures, familiar heaving with the liquid of men, eidolons and red brine wrung from his uniform.

This afternoon unforeseen, he and I so different in Danbury now that we would slay one another war-mouthed at the kitchen table, saliva running down his chin.

And my Grandfather's eyes like Mount Suribachi at midnight.

Before me a container of sugar, holy temple that keeps earthfallen stars, from where God will spoon deathshake grinding sweetness out of human dreams this white sand locked behind glass veil.

Over coffee, the down-pour predicted beyond September seven years ago what will be a more terrible bellowing, of seven trumpets, seven bowls, tomorrow, the seven cities.

Alas, the deafening silence before silence when all is sackcloth smoldering all the coffee like wormwood.